Notice on “2011 Summit Meeting on Chemical Regulations in China, Korea and Japan”

Summit Background

With the latest development of global chemical industry, concerns about chemical safety and its sustainable development have become increasingly the world's focus of attention. Since the introduction of EU REACH regulation, China, Korea and Japan have revised or drafted their own chemical legislation recently to overhaul chemicals management, creating new challenges to chemical industry and regulatory authorities.

In a time when chemical regulations have become more stringent at an international level, how should chemical industry respond to the increasing needs of chemical regulatory compliance in China, Korea and Japan? How do regulatory authorities strengthen their chemical safety management and seek the balance between the chemical trade and the protection of human health and environment? Confronted with various difficulties in their practical work, such as lack of technical know-how and experience, and high compliance costs, what could chemical companies do to overcome all those challenges on their road to compliance?
